

ADA & People with MS

Employment Issues

National
Multiple Sclerosis
Society

Images on pages 4, 11, 15,
20, and 21 courtesy of Jupiterimages Corporation
© 2007.

Laura D. Cooper, Esq., practices in Eugene, Oregon.
She has served as a legal consultant for the National MS Society for many years.

Nancy Law, LSW, is executive vice president of Programs and Services for the National MS Society.

Jane Sarnoff is a professional health writer.

Cover photograph by Ed Kashi.

Special thanks to volunteers Mark Stolman, Esq., and Jim Rea for their careful reviews.

This publication is supported by contributions to the National MS Society from its members and friends.

Reviewed by members of the Client Education
Committee of the National Multiple Sclerosis Society's Medical Advisory Board.

© 2007 National Multiple Sclerosis Society

ADA & People with MS

by Laura D. Cooper, Esq. and Nancy Law, LSW with Jane Sarnoff

The Americans with Disabilities Act: protection for people with multiple sclerosis

The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA)—which became law in July 1990—is the first comprehensive legislation passed by any country in the world to prohibit discrimination on the basis of disability. The ADA guarantees full participation in American society for all people with disabilities just as the Civil Rights Act of 1964 guaranteed the rights of all people regardless of race, sex, national origin, or religion. And there are other federal, state, and local laws that also protect people who are disabled.

The ADA covers almost everyone with MS. It doesn't only apply to people who use wheelchairs. It covers every person with an impairment that substantially limits one or more major life activities. Even people with multiple sclerosis who have never had any disabling symptoms can be protected if they are perceived as disabled or they have records of such impairments.

Your ADA guarantee of full participation in American society includes:

Protection from Discrimination
in Employment ..... 4

Protection from Discrimination
in Public Accommodations ..... 11

Protection from Discrimination
in Transportation ..... 15

Protection from Discrimination
in Telecommunications.....20

Protection from Discrimination in Government Agencies and Facilities .....21

If You Need Help .....22

Protection from Discrimination in Employment

Major employment protections are guaranteed by the ADA.

- The ADA prohibits nongovernmental employers with more than 15 employees from discrimination in employment against any qualified individual with a disability.
- Employment agencies, labor organizations, and joint labor-management committees cannot discriminate against people who are disabled.
- The prohibition against discrimination includes applicants, new employees, and employees who become impaired while employed.

The prohibitions make many forms of discrimination illegal beyond the basic issues of being hired or fired. For example:

- An applicant or employee with a disability can't be set apart or classified in a way that adversely affects employment opportunities. You cannot, for example, be hired with the understanding that you will not be given a promotion because of a disability.
- An employer can't make a contract that has the effect of discriminating against a person with a disability before or after being hired. For example, a company cannot use a health insurance provider that refuses to cover a person with MS while covering other disabilities. Nor can the company use an employment agency that won't place people who use or might use mobility devices.
- Tests or other criteria that screen out an individual or a class of individuals with disabilities can't be used. And tests that are used must accurately reflect the skills and aptitude of the applicant for the job. For example, an employer can't require a test of physical endurance for an office job requiring no strength.
- A job can't be refused to a qualified person because of a relationship or association with a person with disabilities. For example, your husband or wife can't be refused a job because you have MS.

Do I have to tell a potential employer I have MS?

No. You don't have to provide a diagnosis before you are given a job offer. If you need accommodations for a job interview or to do the job if it is offered, you will have to discuss your limitations, but not your diagnosis. If, and only if, the employer requires a medical exam of everyone who fills the position that you are applying for, will you need to say that you have MS.

Do I have to take a medical examination to get a job?

Most covered employers are prohibited from asking about medical history or disability when you are applying for a job. And they cannot ask about your medical status when checking your references or your background. But a potential employer may ask if you can walk, if walking is an essential function of the job. An employer may also make a job offer contingent on the results of a medical exam or inquiry, if that exam is required for all candidates. If the results show a disability, and you are then denied the job, the employer's decision must be based on job-related factors and your specific, current impairments and not on your diagnosis or speculation about future impairments.

Do I have to take a medical examination to keep a job?

Yes, if the medical exam is job-related. If the exam shows that you have a disability, your employer must make reasonable accommodations for the disability so that you are able to perform essential job functions.

Do I have to tell a current employer that I have MS?

No, you don't have to provide a diagnosis. But as a practical matter it is often necessary since requests for accommodations, as described in the next section, must come from you.

THE BOTTOM LINE

Employers are generally forbidden from considering medical diagnoses in either pre- or post-employment decision making. The employer must consider your current ability rather than your diagnosis or any potential, real, or imagined future deterioration. The diagnosis of MS cannot, by itself, disqualify you from getting, keeping, or being promoted to a job for which you are qualified.

Three key concepts

The ADA requires an employer to make changes in the workplace or in a job's conditions to help make it possible for a person with a disability to perform "essential job functions." But the law isn't intended to put the company out of business. The changes, which are called accommodations, must be reasonable. An employer cannot refuse to make "reasonable accommodations" unless they impose an "undue hardship" on the employer or pose a "direct threat" to health or safety at work.

1. "Reasonable accommodation"

"Reasonable accommodation" makes it possible for people with disabilities to be employed. Reasonable accommodations might include:

- Modifying work hours or changing the place where work is performed.
- Providing reserved parking for an employee with a mobility impairment.

- Allowing an employee to use earned or unpaid leave for necessary treatment.
- Changing job descriptions, especially in relation to marginal job functions.
- Buying or modifying equipment or devices.
- Allowing an employee to provide equipment or devices that the employer is not required to furnish.
- Adjusting or modifying examinations, training materials, and policies.
- Providing qualified readers or interpreters.
- Altering physical facilities to make them accessible and usable.

The employer must ensure that employees with disabilities have access to company programs and services such as rest rooms, health programs, meeting rooms, lunchrooms, lounges, and social events. The employer can be excused from providing physical access if that creates an undue hardship but must then provide access to the program or service in some other fashion.

2. “Undue hardship”

Although the general guidelines for reasonable accommodations must be followed by everyone, the key words are “undue hardship.” The employee’s needs and the employer’s ability to accommodate those needs without undue hardship are taken into account in deciding what is reasonable. What is “reasonable” for one employer might not be for another. What a large corporation might be required to do can be an undue hardship for a smaller business.

An accommodation need not be made if it is impractical, if it costs more than an equally effective alternative, if it requires renovation that will disrupt business, or if it causes unreasonable problems for other employees or customers. Undue hardship is decided on a case-by-case basis—by the employer. The determination can be challenged in court or before the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), the federal administrative enforcement agency for the employment title of the ADA.

3. “Essential job functions”

Like undue hardship, “essential job functions” are defined by the employer, on a job-by-job basis, but again, the determination can be challenged. The law says that essential job functions are tasks that are fundamental, not marginal—for reasons that include but aren’t limited to the following:

- The position exists to perform the function. (For example, as the office receptionist, you must answer the telephone.)
- The function is highly specialized. (As a laboratory researcher, you use your PhD in biology and your manual dexterity.)
- The company has a limited number of employees among whom the function can be distributed. (As inventory clerk, you make deliveries a half day each week and no other staff person is available for this duty.)

Taking action ... whose job is it?

You, the employee or job applicant, must start the procedure. The ADA gives you the responsibility for requesting an accommodation, and unfortunately, the law doesn't make the procedure clear. After the request has been made, the ADA says the employer and the employee or job applicant share responsibility for planning accommodations.

All solutions need discussion. You must state the need for an accommodation clearly to the proper employer representative. Some employers require everything in writing; others are less formal.

Some solutions are clear. For example, a ramp is needed for wheelchair access.

Some solutions are simpler than expected. For example, a desk can be made wheelchair-accessible by putting blocks of wood under the legs. Custom furniture may not be necessary.

Some solutions need compromise. For example, you might want a voice-output computer program to accommodate a vision problem; your employer might be willing only to supply a larger screen. The compromise might be software that enlarges the text display.

All requests and solutions need to be approached carefully. Plan and rehearse your requests. Know exactly what you want—and what you are willing to accept. One successful approach is to base your requests on increased productivity rather than your rights under the ADA.

This means asking for a change to enhance your job performance rather than as a needed accommodation.

Protection from Discrimination in Public Accommodations

The ADA is written to make sure that people with disabilities are able to use the full range of accommodations (services and facilities) available to the public at large. Over a period of time, implementation of the ADA should make almost every community service and facility equally available to all.

- ADA prohibits discrimination in public programs and services provided by state or local governments, including government-funded transportation.
- ADA prohibits discrimination in public accommodations that are operated by private entities.

Services and facilities in which discrimination is prohibited include, but are not limited to, the following places to which the public is invited:

- Hotels, inns, motels, and other places of lodging except those inside a building that is used by the proprietor as a residence and has five or fewer rooms for rent.
- Movies, theaters, concert halls, stadiums, and other places of exhibition or entertainment.
- Auditoriums, convention centers, lecture halls, and other places of public gathering.
- Museums, libraries, galleries, and other places of public display or collection.
- Parks, zoos, amusement parks, and other places of recreation or entertainment.
- Gymnasiums, health spas, bowling alleys, golf courses, and other places of exercise or recreation.
- Nursery, elementary, secondary, undergraduate, or postgraduate private schools and other places of education.
- Restaurants, bars, and other establishments serving food or drink.
- Stores selling any type of product, shopping centers or malls, and other sales or rental establishments.
- Doctors' offices, hospitals, health-care providers, laundromats, dry cleaners, banks, beauty parlors and barbershops, repair shops, gas stations, funeral parlors, and offices of accountants, lawyers, insurance agents, and other service establishments.

- Terminals, depots, or other stations used for public transportation.
- Social service establishments including day-care or senior citizen centers, homeless shelters, battered women's shelters, food banks, adoption agencies, and others.

The ADA makes it clear that ...

1. People with disabilities have the right to use fully the facilities and services provided to the general public. The ADA prohibits providing separate or unequal treatment.

You cannot be asked to leave a park because the park's insurance does not cover people with disabilities. You cannot be asked to sit in a special area of a restaurant because you might make other customers uncomfortable.

2. Public accommodations are required to make "reasonable modifications" in their policies, practices, and procedures to make goods and services available to people with disabilities.

A store that usually allows only one person into a dressing room must make an exception to that policy for a person who needs assistance from a companion. No changes need to be made if the business can show that doing so would make a fundamental change in the nature of goods and services it provides.

3. Public accommodations must remove architectural barriers when removal is "readily achievable."

The standard of "readily achievable" is flexible and meant to be determined on a case-by-case basis.

Barriers that might be removed or modified include curbs, steps, narrow doorways, aisles, or rest room stalls. Telephones, drinking fountains, and cash machines are to be made accessible. An architectural change is considered readily achievable if it can be carried out without much difficulty or expense. If it is not readily achievable, an alternative must be offered. For example, if a store can't provide an accessible dressing room, a liberal return policy can be adopted. The IRS allows a tax deduction of up to $15,000 for certain expenses associated with the removal of qualified architectural and transportation barriers even if those expenses constitute capital improvements.

4. Facilities which are newly built must be readily accessible to and usable by people with disabilities.

Any new building must be accessible. Technical standards for new construction and alterations have been issued by the Architectural and Transportation Barriers Compliance Board (also known as the U.S. Access Board). For a free copy of the standards, call 800-872-2253 (V) (TTY 800-993-2822). A copy is also available at <http://www.access-board.gov/adaag/html/adaag.htm>.

What the ADA does not do ...

1. The ADA does not cover private residential facilities.

Discrimination against people with disabilities in the renting and selling of private housing is covered by the Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1988.

- 2. The ADA exempts private clubs and religious organizations, including places of worship, from these requirements.*

Although some places of worship lead the way in removing barriers, one disability study showed that, in general, they are less accessible than nonreligious facilities.

Protection from Discrimination in Transportation

The ADA specifically includes transportation protections, but implementation of this aspect of the law will be slow because of the cost of replacing or refitting existing vehicles. Discrimination is prohibited in urban transit, paratransit, publicly funded rail systems, and transit facilities. (Note: A paratransit system is a door-to-door transportation service.)

- Bus, rail, boat, ship, or ferry transportation cannot discriminate against people with disabilities. Air travel is not included since it is already covered by the Air Carrier Access Act.
- The protection against discrimination extends to private companies whose primary business is transporting people, such as privately owned bus companies.
- Any transportation provided to the general public must be available to people who are disabled. This means that hotels, private colleges, funeral homes, social or day-care centers, and other entities that provide limited transportation must accommodate all people.
- Any new transportation system must be accessible. But existing rail and light-rail system stations need not be made wheelchair accessible unless the facility has been designated a “key” station.

Public Transportation

1. Public transportation systems running on fixed routes (such as city buses) must rent or buy new vehicles that are accessible to people with disabilities.

New vehicles must be able to transport all common wheelchairs, including scooters and electric wheelchairs, in designated areas. People who use wheelchairs cannot be required to transfer to a regular seat and need not use a seat belt unless all passengers are required to. Vehicles in use before the ADA became law need not be adapted for wheelchair use.

2. People with disabilities who don't use wheelchairs may use the lift or ramp.

Accessibility features aren't limited to people who use wheelchairs; they are available to anyone with significant mobility problems, including MS-related weakness and balance problems, for example.

3. If accessibility features aren't in good repair, other transportation must be provided.

If a broken lift, door, or security device makes use impossible, substitute transportation, such as a taxicab, must be made available.

4. Transit systems that operate fixed-route systems must provide paratransit to individuals with disabilities who cannot use the fixed-route system.

5. Paratransit service is available to:

- People whose disability makes them unable to use the fixed-route system.
- People who need to travel on routes served only by inaccessible vehicles.
- People whose disabilities make them unable to travel to and from the fixed-route transit stop.

6. Commuter bus routes are not required to provide paratransit nor are companies for whom it would create an "undue financial burden." As the number of accessible vehicles increases, companies may phase out or limit paratransit systems by claiming undue financial burden. Stay alert to changes in local policy.

7. Commuter, rapid, and light-rail systems must have at least one accessible car per train. And paratransit must be provided for those who are unable to use the system after it has been made accessible.
8. Amtrak trains must provide one wheelchair space per passenger car, and no more than two wheelchair spots can be in any one car. (Railroad cars built before 1990 had to be brought up to this standard by July 2000.) Amtrak has accessible sleeping berths available by advance notice.

Private transportation systems

1. All of the policies that apply to publicly funded transit systems also apply to privately funded systems that are primarily in the business of providing transportation.

This means that:

- All new vehicles for fixed-route systems (such as airport shuttles that run on a schedule) must be accessible.
- Accessible vehicles for demand-responsive systems (such as airport services that you call to arrange) must be available, although all vehicles in the system need not be accessible.
- Taxis cannot discriminate against a person with a disability hailing or calling its service, but taxi vehicles don't need to be structurally altered.
- Intercity buses (buses that go from city to city) that are not required to be equipped with a lift must accept wheelchairs without advance notice.

- 48 hours' notice should be provided to a bus company that boarding assistance is needed, but even when there is no notice there must be a "reasonable effort" to assist.
- Equipment such as wheelchairs or crutches must be given preference in loading over luggage at the same stop.
- Drivers must stop at accessible rest stops when requested.

Private transportation as part of another service

1. The ADA includes special regulations for private facilities that provide transportation as a service to customers such as hotels, rental car companies, and day-care centers.
2. Newly acquired vehicles carrying more than eight persons must be accessible if used on fixed routes.
3. If service is in response to a call and the vehicles are not accessible, reasonable accommodations must be made; these might include portable ramps or sharing an accessible vehicle with another provider. The waiting time for a person with a disability should be reasonably comparable to that of other customers.

Protection from Discrimination in Telecommunications

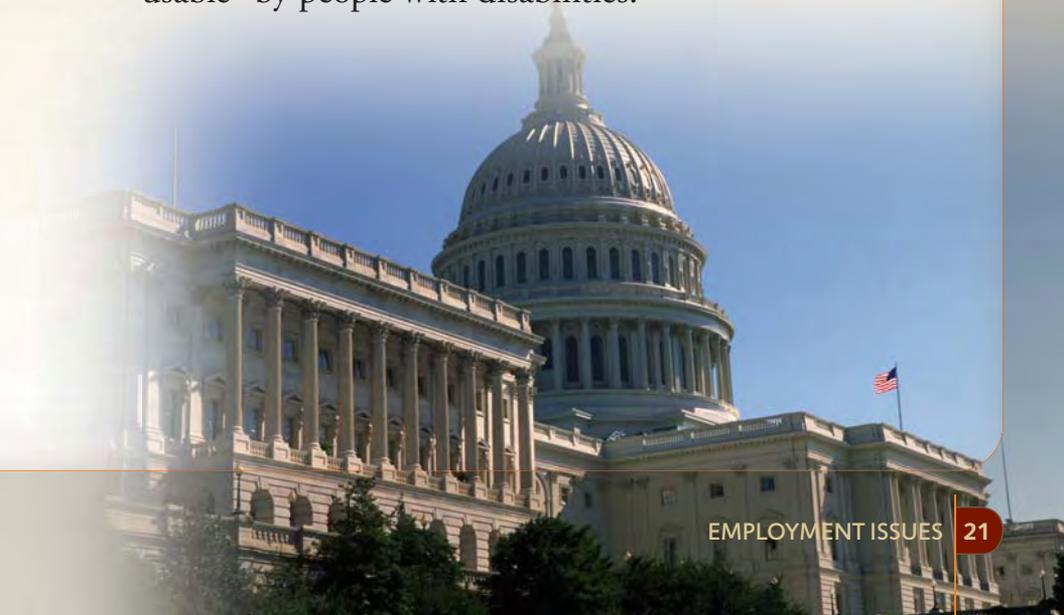

All common carriers engaged in interstate communications by wire or radio must provide telecommunications relay services for hearing-impaired and/or speech-impaired customers.

- A person who has a speech or hearing impairment must be provided with special services by the telecommunications company. If, for example, your speech is impaired because of MS, your telephone company must make it possible for you to communicate using a non-voice terminal with someone who does not have such a device. Your call goes to a special operator or “interpreter” who speaks to the party you are calling.
- All communications handled by interpreters are confidential and must be relayed without censorship beyond that required for all telephone services.
- The telecommunications relay services must operate every day, for the full 24 hours.
- The cost of service is funded by the telephone systems. The cost of the call to users of relay services cannot be more than that of a regular phone call.

Protection from Discrimination in Government Agencies and Facilities

The ADA covers the U.S. Senate and the U.S. House of Representatives, but enforcement is an issue since the EEOC is an agency of the executive branch and cannot give orders to the legislative branch.

- The executive branch of the federal government is covered by the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, which is comparable in many respects to the ADA.
- State and local government services are covered under the Rehabilitation Act if, and only if, they receive federal funds.
- State and local governments must make their programs “usable” by people with disabilities.

- If state or local government employees suffer job discrimination and they sue their employers, they cannot recover money damages to compensate them for the discrimination. If the employees sue, they can only get court orders giving them back their jobs. This could make it hard for them to find lawyers to take their cases.
- State and local employees who suffer job discrimination can only recover money from their employers if the United States government sues the state or local government on their behalf.

If You Need Help

The first step to take is a telephone call to your chapter of the National MS Society. They have information on the ADA and on local and state laws that may apply to your situation. Information on enforcement is also available from them. It is wise to act quickly if you think action is needed. In employment-related matters, for example, you may have only 180 days from the time a discriminatory incident occurs to make a formal complaint.

The ADA has established Disability and Business Technical Assistance Centers to provide information and referral, technical assistance, public awareness, and training on all aspects of the ADA. To contact your nearest center, call 800-949-4232 (V/TTY), or visit their Web site at www.dbtac.vcu.edu.

The Job Accommodation Network is an international information and consulting resource. Both people with disabilities and employers can contact them for practical help in making accommodations. Call 800-526-7234 (V), 877-781-9403 (TTY), or visit their Web site at www.jan.wvu.edu.

If you believe that your employer or potential employer is not living up to the obligations of the ADA, call your Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) District Office, or the National Office: 800-669-4000 (V) or 1-800-669-6820 (TTY). You can also call 800-669-3362 (V) 800-800-3302 (TTY) for written information. Visit their Web site at www.eeoc.gov.

The Disability Rights Education and Defense Fund, based in Berkeley, California, is a national law and policy center dedicated to protecting and advancing the civil rights of people with disabilities through legislation, litigation, advocacy, technical assistance, and other services. Call 800-348-4232, or visit their Web site at www.dredf.org.

For more information on the Air Carrier Access Act, visit the U.S. Department of Transportation Web site at <http://airconsumer.ost.dot.gov>.

The National Multiple Sclerosis Society is concerned that you have the greatest possible opportunity for work and advancement. If you need more information about obtaining your rights for employment under the ADA, contact your local chapter by calling 1-800-344-4867. Ask for our booklet “The Win-Win Approach to Reasonable Accommodations.”

The Department of Justice has an excellent ADA Web site at www.ada.gov.

For fair housing information and resources, visit www.fairhousinglaw.org and www.fairhousingfirst.org.

The U.S. Access Board has an excellent Web site at www.access-board.gov.

The National Multiple Sclerosis Society is proud to be a source of information about multiple sclerosis. Our comments are based on professional advice, published experience, and expert opinion, but do not represent individual therapeutic recommendations or prescription. For specific information and advice, consult your personal physician.

The Society publishes many other pamphlets and articles about various aspects of MS. To ask for these, or for other information, call the National MS Society at 1-800-344-4867.

All our publications are on our Web site, along with handouts called "Basic Facts" on various topics. For a list, click the bar on our home page called "Library." If you have no access to the Internet, just call your chapter and ask for a copy of the latest Publications List.

Some of our popular pamphlets include:

- Information for Employers
- Should I Work? Information for Employees
- The Win-Win Approach to Reasonable Accommodations
- A Place in the Workforce

MS STOPS PEOPLE FROM MOVING.

WE EXIST TO MAKE SURE IT DOESN'T.

JOIN THE MOVEMENT.

National
Multiple Sclerosis
Society

700 Broadway Suite 810

Denver CO 80203

tel 303 813 1052

fax 303 813 1513

nationalMSsociety.org

For Information: 1 800 344 4867